The Paris Agreement in Plain English

In December 2015, representatives from 196 countries met in Paris for COP21. After two weeks of negotiation, they signed an agreement with one clear goal: to keep global warming "well below 2°C" above pre-industrial levels, and to try for 1.5°C if possible.

What made the Paris Agreement different was its structure. Instead of forcing every country to cut emissions by the same amount, each country submitted its own plan, called an NDC (Nationally Determined Contribution). A small island nation like Tuvalu and a large industrial country like Germany could both join — but their promises looked very different, based on their size, wealth, and geography.

Critics pointed out a weakness from the start: the agreement had no real punishment for countries that missed their targets. Supporters argued that getting almost every country in the world to agree on anything was already historic.

4. What is an NDC, and why might a small island nation's NDC look different from Germany's?

5. What is the main criticism of the Paris Agreement mentioned in the text?

6. Using what you found in the map task, explain why nearly 200 countries with very different geography could still agree on the same treaty.
